

To whom it may concern,

I am writing this letter to the Anatomy of Islands 2018 Workshop and Symposium in Lastovo Island. I am a student of co+labo in Keio University and I received a call for the application via my professor, Professor Darko Radovic.

My laboratory, co+labo is a laboratory at Keio University in Tokyo which is in the field of architecture and urban design. The laboratory focuses on ways to sustain the city by discovering the characteristics and elements of the site through not only quantitative but also through qualitative research, such as finding the border of public and private, analyzing the shapes of urban spaces, and examining the behaviours of people. Also, thanks to the laboratory's international characteristic, all the laboratory members are good collaborators who can work and produce great projects with not only people in Japan but from all over the world.

I am pleased to find out about this possibility for taking part in the workshop since I perceive there is no other opportunity rather than this Anatomy of Islands where I can collaborate with universities around the world and have an intense discussion about sustaining a beautiful island.

I believe that activities and workshop at Lastovo island will be good experience for me and will improve my skills.

Shinichi Nishibori